

Co-Tutelle PhD Programme in Global Screen Studies Admission Requirements (October 2022 Admission)

Graduate School of Humanities, Nagoya University, Japan and Department of Film and Television Studies, University of Warwick, UK

In collaboration with the University of Warwick, UK, Nagoya University invites students to apply for admission to the Co-Tutelle PhD Programme in Global Screen Studies with English as medium of instruction, according to the terms and conditions below.

Introduction

The Graduate School of Humanities at Nagoya University and the Department of Film and Television Studies at the University of Warwick offer an innovative and collaborative PhD programme that consolidates an existing research partnership and introduces a range of exciting research opportunities for graduate students wishing to work on projects related to the study of world screen cultures.

Students can enrol on a 3-4 year doctoral studies programme at either Nagoya or Warwick and enjoy joint supervision across the duration of their studies with a dedicated year of study and research at the respective partner institution. Students are expected to graduate with one degree from the main university with a certificate from the partner university attached. Students can thus benefit from the dynamic interaction of the existing research and pedagogical strengths in the two institutions with the added advantage of enjoying a programme of study in both East Asia and Europe.

The co-tutelle programme is designed cohesively and collaboratively with a range of benefits in terms of active participation in the wider graduate research cultures of the two universities. They include the opportunity to take part in related MA classes/modules provided by both departments and involvement in the various research talks, conferences and symposia organised throughout the year at Nagoya and Warwick.

It is thus designed to deliver the following objectives:

- A high-quality graduate experience with an international focus
- The possibility of studying in at least two different regional contexts and film cultures
- The chance to carry out a tailored research project that strengthens an intensive understanding of the global nature of screen culture
- The opportunity to collaborate with a range of international film and television scholars with different methodological perspectives
- The chance to develop language skills related to more than one regional context
- The enhancement of future employability skills related to academia and related professions worldwide

Below are the guidelines for students who wish to apply for admission at Nagoya University. For students who wish to apply for admission at the University of Warwick, the guidelines are available on the website of its Film and Television Studies Programme.
